

Description Can a foundering seaside village survive the onslaught of marauding Vikings bearing down on them? Desperate to save her village from a band of Norsemen sweeping down the coastline, Kaylla catches her first ray of hope when she discovers one of the pillaging heathens washed ashore. Perhaps they can use this captive to bargain for the safety of their village. Rolf Bloodhands, sole survivor of a traitorous attack on his king's fleet, assures her that his kinsmen will not spare the easy conquest of their waning village for the life of one man. Instead he teaches them the basics of defense and combat with the meager weapons they have available. If they fail to stave off the invaders, the few villagers left will either be killed or enslaved. Reader Alert! : With only two days to prepare for an invasion sure to decimate her village, Kaylla is shocked by her attraction to the hunky Norseman she has enslaved. Who knew fear of imminent death could drive an innocent woman to explore the oldest sins known to man. To My Readers: I've always loved the fantasy of finding a gorgeous man in need of medical attention on my property. After nursing him back to health, he would, of course, find me irresistibly desirable and fall madly in love with me. Combine that with my love of Vikings and Rolf Bloodhands comes deliciously to life. Kaylla's good heart and natural desire to take care of everyone around her is a soothing balm to Rolf's thirst for vengeance. I hope you enjoy Rolf and Kaylla's red hot story. About the Author: Yes, Bambi is my real name. I grew up on a farm in South Georgia. My high school was very small with a graduating class of less than 100 people. Shortly after high school, I met my wonderful husband who took me to Belgium, where a three-year tour turned into fifteen. While living in Europe, I nurtured my love of all things medieval. I often get homesick for Belgium, but with the world wide web, I'm home with the click of a mouse. I now live with my husband and son in North Alabama. When not plugging away at my keyboard, I teach World History. I love to ride my big, black Tennessee Walker, Jamaica. My husband and I each have a Harley to go with our collection of classic cars and hot rods. Excerpt Kaylla gathered up her net and crept down the dune, the trek made more perilous by her inability to focus on where she put her feet. She kept her gaze on her surroundings, her eyes darting from the dunes to the ocean's surface, down the beach and back again, fear and trepidation overriding the need to descend with caution. After the attack on the abbey, the marauders had continued to sack villages and towns along the coast, leaving a wake of death and destruction. Men were murdered, women and children slaughtered, or worse "stolen. They left slain cattle to rot among the carnage, leaving little for survivors to eat. She stood still when she reached the base of the slope, cautious of darting out onto the narrow beach. Her heart raced. She felt as a doe must, contemplating a romp in the meadow on a bright spring morning. But the warm air of her favorite time of year was nowhere present on this brisk day. The trickle of sunlight that forced its way through the clouds had failed to chase the bite from the air. She removed her shoes, knowing they would take longer to dry, and crept across the sand. Despite the cold, she savored the feel of it squishing up between her toes. It grew firmer the closer she got to the waves that surged in to meet the rocky waterline. Climbing onto a slick boulder, she prepared her net and cast it out. The woven cords caught in her skirt and went nowhere. Serves me right for rushing. She tucked the hem of her smock into the rope tied at her waist and tried again. She wove her fingers through the tangled mass, methodically smoothing it out, and gathered it into one hand, a single arm-length at a time. When she reached the bottom, she tossed several of the stones she used to weigh it down .
