All of the street lamps were on and offering some soft lighting along the sidewalks. Then there were the holiday decorations and lights that made the entire street look like a wonderland. The snow still came down in larger flakes. Chrystal loved it all. Just as she reached her car, her cell phone rang. Unlocking her door, she climbed into car and answered. "Hey, babe," Travis's voice greeted her. "I thought you'd be home by now." "Yeah, I know," she said as she started her car. "I got held up. I'll explain when I get there. Are you at my parents' house or the cottage?" "I checked at the cottage first but, when you weren't there, I came up to the main house. Your parents and I are having some wine while we wait for you." "Okay, I'll be there in just a few minutes, Travis. Please apologize to my parents for me. I'll see you in a bit." "Be careful." "Always." Setting the phone in the console, she focused all of her attention on driving. She had been driving in snow all of her life and was a decent driver, but it never hurt to make sure that she did everything possible to reach her destination safely. Once she reached her parents' estate, she rolled through the gates and took a slight detour back to her cottage. She really did want to freshen up a little even if her bubble bath would have to wait.
